

The image shows a close-up of fossilized dragonfly wings embedded in a light-colored, textured rock matrix. The wings are arranged in two pairs, with the upper pair slightly overlapping the lower pair. The intricate network of veins is clearly visible, showing a complex pattern of primary, secondary, and tertiary veins. The fossilization process has preserved the delicate structure of the wings, which appear as a golden-brown color against the greyish rock.

Peter
Sloterdijk
Das Schelling
Projekt

Subkamp